Inside The Numbers

The numbers tell the story of a fighter who came back with a clear game plan and executed it. In the first fight, the two men were virtually mirror images in output — Cardenas throwing 56 punches per round to Martinez's 57, a statistical dead heat. In the rematch, those lines crossed sharply in opposite directions. Cardenas ramped his output up to 66 thrown per round while Martinez fell to 47, a simultaneous 18% swing that flipped the volume dynamic entirely.

The power punch ledger made the case even more decisively. Cardenas's 130 to 69 edge — nearly a 2-to-1 margin — gave the judges something to score beyond mere activity, and all three returned lopsided scorecards for Cardenas- 100-90, 98-92, and 97-93.

Martinez landed at a slightly better clip per round in the rematch (13 to Cardenas's 18 on comparable volume), but couldn't overcome the combination of throwing less and absorbing far more. Whatever adjustments Cardenas made between fights, they worked.
